Safe, healthy work. It's the law.

Employers have the greatest power over working environments and therefore the greatest responsibilities and legal duties to protect the health and safety of workers. When those duties aren't fulfilled, workers suffer most.

That's why working people fought to secure their own health and safety rights to know about workplace hazards, to participate in their elimination and control through their joint health and safety committees and worker health and safety representatives and to refuse unsafe work when need be.

Workers and their representatives know safe, healthy work begins with:

- Full employer accountability and
- Meaningful worker participation.

But they also understand worker well-being needs the support of:

- Laws and regulations that are specific and enforced
- Quality training focused on workplace hazards, not worker behaviours and
- Sufficient trusted resources.

On April 28, our National Day of Mourning for workers injured, killed or made ill because of hazardous workplace exposures, let's demand what the law promises—safe and healthy work. Let's renew our efforts to make work safe!

By law, employers must provide their workers with general and job-specific instruction and training including, but not limited to:

- WHMIS-GHS
- Worker Awareness
- Working at Heights
- Safe Lockout-Tagout
- Confined Space Entry
- JHSC Certification Parts I & II
- Transportation of Dangerous Goods
- Workplace Violence and Harassment
- Mobile Equipment Operator Competency

Not sure if your workplace complies with all legal training requirements? Contact WHSC and ask to speak with a training services representative.
